Dick Clark had a heart attack. He was residing at his SoHo residence. He died at 9:30 a.m. in his sleep this morning. He was 82.

He had undergone surgery for an aneurysm in 2004 that has since been repaired.

He had told friends and family several times that he was an organ donor.

Dick's family has learned that he was being treated for cancer.

Clark told The Associated Press that he was "idiopathic hypertrophic subaortic stenosis," also known as "Muscular Subaortic Stenosis," or "leaky valve syndrome.

Clark had heart surgery in 1980 that left him with an artificial valve. He was scheduled to have another valve replacement in 2015.

His wife, Marie Leilani Clark, told AP, "He was a very accepting and tolerant individual. He was very loved by a lot of people around the world. We were planning for heightening awareness about TV bloopers. He was known as the host of the American Bandstand and the TV show Countdown."

Clark was born in Norman, Okla., on April 15, 1929. He was the only child of Mary Louise (Seymour) Clark and Millard C. Clark.

He was awarded the National Medal of Arts by President Barack Obama in 2011.

He was named the nation's greatest television host by the National Association of Broadcasters in 2005.

Clark had a heart attack. He was residing at his SoHo residence. He died at 9:30 a.m. in his sleep this morning. He was 82.

He had undergone surgery for an aneurysm in 2004 that has since been repaired.

He had told friends and family several times that he was an organ donor.

Dick's family has learned that he was being treated for cancer.

Clark told The Associated Press that he was "idiopathic hypertrophic subaortic stenosis," also known as "Muscular Subaortic Stenosis," or "leaky valve syndrome.

Clark had heart surgery in 1980 that left him with an artificial valve. He was scheduled to have another valve replacement in 2015.

His wife, Marie Leilani Clark, told AP, "He was a very accepting and tolerant individual. He was very loved by a lot of people around the world. We were planning for heightening awareness about TV bloopers. He was known as the host of the American Bandstand and the TV show Countdown."

Clark was born in Norman, Okla., on April 15, 1929. He was the only child of Mary Louise (Seymour) Clark and Millard C. Clark.

He was awarded the National Medal of Arts by President Barack Obama in 2011.

He was named the nation's greatest television host by the National Association of Broadcasters in 2005.

Clark had a heart attack. He was residing at his SoHo residence. He died at 9:30 a.m. in his sleep this morning. He was 82.

He had undergone surgery for an aneurysm in 2004 that has since been repaired.

He had told friends and family several times that he was an organ donor.

Dick's family has learned that he was being treated for cancer.

Clark told The Associated Press that he was "idiopathic hypertrophic subaortic stenosis," also known as "Muscular Subaortic Stenosis," or "leaky valve syndrome.

Clark had heart surgery in 1980 that left him with an artificial valve. He was scheduled to have another valve replacement in 2015.

His wife, Marie Leilani Clark, told AP, "He was a very accepting and tolerant individual. He was very loved by a lot of people around the world. We were planning for heightening awareness about TV bloopers. He was known as the host of the American Bandstand and the TV show Countdown."

Clark was born in Norman, Okla., on April 15, 1929. He was the only child of Mary Louise (Seymour) Clark and Millard C. Clark.

He was awarded the National Medal of Arts by President Barack Obama in 2011.

He was named the nation's greatest television host by the National Association of Broadcasters in 2005.

Clark had a heart attack. He was residing at his SoHo residence. He died at 9:30 a.m. in his sleep this morning. He was 82.

He had undergone surgery for an aneurysm in 2004 that has since been repaired.

He had told friends and family several times that he was an organ donor.

Dick's family has learned that he was being treated for cancer.

Clark told The Associated Press that he was "idiopathic hypertrophic subaortic stenosis," also known as "Muscular Subaortic Stenosis," or "leaky valve syndrome.

Clark had heart surgery in 1980 that left him with an artificial valve. He was scheduled to have another valve replacement in 2015.

His wife, Marie Leilani Clark, told AP, "He was a very accepting and tolerant individual. He was very loved by a lot of people around the world. We were planning for heightening awareness about TV bloopers. He was known as the host of the American Bandstand and the TV show Countdown."

Clark was born in Norman, Okla., on April 15, 1929. He was the only child of Mary Louise (Seymour) Clark and Millard C. Clark.

He was awarded the National Medal of Arts by President Barack Obama in 2011.

He was named the nation's greatest television host by the National Association of Broadcasters in 2005.

Clark had a heart attack. He was residing at his SoHo residence. He died at 9:30 a.m. in his sleep this morning. He was 82.

He had undergone surgery for an aneurysm in 2004 that has since been repaired.

He had told friends and family several times that he was an organ donor.

Dick's family has learned that he was being treated for cancer.

Clark told The Associated Press that he was "idiopathic hypertrophic subaortic stenosis," also known as "Muscular Subaortic Stenosis," or "leaky valve syndrome.

Clark had heart surgery in 1980 that left him with an artificial valve. He was scheduled to have another valve replacement in 2015.

His wife, Marie Leilani Clark, told AP, "He was a very accepting and tolerant individual. He was very loved by a lot of people around the world. We were planning for heightening awareness about TV bloopers. He was known as the host of the American Bandstand and the TV show Countdown."

Clark was born in Norman, Okla., on April 15, 1929. He was the only child of Mary Louise (Seymour) Clark and Millard C. Clark.

He was awarded the National Medal of Arts by President Barack Obama in 2011.

He was named the nation's greatest television host by the National Association of Broadcasters in 2005.

Clark had a heart attack. He was residing at his SoHo residence. He died at 9:30 a.m. in his sleep this morning. He was 82.

He had undergone surgery for an aneurysm in 2004 that has since been repaired.

He had told friends and family several times that he was an organ donor.

Dick's family has learned that he was being treated for cancer.

Clark told The Associated Press that he was "idiopathic hypertrophic subaortic stenosis," also known as "Muscular Subaortic Stenosis," or "leaky valve syndrome.

Clark had heart surgery in 1980 that left him with an artificial valve. He was scheduled to have another valve replacement in 2015.

His wife, Marie Leilani Clark, told AP, "He was a very accepting and tolerant individual. He was very loved by a lot of people around the world. We were planning for heightening awareness about TV bloopers. He was known as the host of the American Bandstand and the TV show Countdown."

Clark was born in Norman, Okla., on April 15, 1929. He was the only child of Mary Louise (Seymour) Clark and Millard C. Clark.

He was awarded the National Medal of Arts by President Barack Obama in 2011.

He was named the nation's greatest television host by the National Association of Broadcasters in 2005.

Clark had a heart attack. He was residing at his SoHo residence. He died at 9:30 a.m. in his sleep this morning. He was 82.

He had undergone surgery for an aneurysm in 2004 that has since been repaired.

He had told friends and family several times that he was an organ donor.

Dick's family has learned that he was being treated for cancer.

Clark told The Associated Press that he was "idiopathic hypertrophic subaortic stenosis," also known as "Muscular Subaortic Stenosis," or "leaky valve syndrome.

Clark had heart surgery in 1980 that left him with an artificial valve. He was scheduled to have another valve replacement in 2015.

His wife, Marie Leilani Clark, told AP, "He was a very accepting and tolerant individual. He was very loved by a lot of people around the world. We were planning for heightening awareness about TV bloopers. He was known as the host of the American Bandstand and the TV show Countdown."

Clark was born in Norman, Okla., on April 15, 1929. He was the only child of Mary Louise (Seymour) Clark and Millard C. Clark.

He was awarded the National Medal of Arts by President Barack Obama in 2011.

He was named the nation's greatest television host by the National Association of Broadcasters in 2005.