girl, who was accustomed to the homage of men.
 "If you are Inez Claire," he began without preface, "I was just starting a search for you."
 Inez looked up. Jimmy did likewise.

"This is evidently no place for me," the latter said laughingly, and turned to talk to the gardener. "Sunderland sure is struck," he muttered to himself.

"Yes, I am Inez Claire," the girl answered; then added with a laugh, "I hope you have discovered that I am an heiress and—"

A swiftly hidden emotion passed across the girl's face and she did not speak for a moment. Finally she looked up and a nervous little laugh accompanied her words.

"That song is all that is left of a career of which I once had fond hopes." By the way in which her fingers caressed the music Sunderland knew that something very dear had been taken from her life.

"My mother used to sing that song, and when I found it in a second-hand shop I bought it and found your name on it," he explained to her. "I went to the studios and found that you had gone. I wanted to trace you and ask you to sing it for me." Inez was silent a long moment, then she looked up and met Sunderland's steady brown eyes fixed upon her. There was something there that called for her confidence.

"I have not sung for a year," she told him. "I failed diamally at my singing and was forced to sell everything I had. The songs, even, had to go. That is how you happen to have found this one." She smiled half wistfully; then her laugh changed to reality. "But I have not failed with my violets."

"But you will sing for me?" Sunderland's voice was half entreaty, half command.

"If you can stand a very rusty voice—I will be glad to," Inez agreed and felt suddenly very glad that someone had commanded her to sing. A peculiar emotional cause had taken possession of her. She did not know whether it was the sight of her own song book again or whether it was Sunderland.

A critic would have known that the girl's voice was not one for public success, but to Sunderland it was the most wonderful music that had ever issued from a woman's throat. Aside from having wandered suddenly into the love world he was carried away by the familiar air of the song and the fairy legend of the words. He was back at his mother's side and she was singing to him. Enid Valentine had gone out of his life and Inez Claire had entered in.

A moment later he looked up. He was alone in the tiny room and Inez was out among the violets. Sunderland arose and followed her.

She did not look up from the flowers when he stood beside her, but went on cutting. A flush played about her cheeks and she longed for Jimmy Dale to come so that she would not feel so uncertain of herself.

"I am coming to see you tomorrow and the next day and the next," Sunderland was saying, "and when I have been here a sufficient number of times am going to ask you to marry me."
 Inez looked up then with laughter in her eyes. "I wonder how many days will be sufficient?" she mused.

When he opened his eyes again he was conscious of a presence in the room beside him.
 He stared up at the blank space where the picture had been, and then at the dim corner of the room where the fire-light shone over the mantel wall, making an insubstantial background for the slender form of a girl powdered in gauzy black. A pink rose nestled in her bosom and her fair face set in its frame of misty dark hair looked like another rose.

So Martha's story was true! The fair Rosamond of the picture had stepped down from her frame and come to reproach him—for what? For buying her old home, of course, he told himself as he stared at her with fascinated eyes.

All at once he realized that she was staring back at him in a frightened way. Her hand moved! It flew up to her white throat with a gesture of great fear!

"His picture was alive!"
 "Don't be frightened, Miss Rosamond," he heard himself saying gently.

"Oh!" cried the apparition, turning as if to flee.

"Please stay—I thought you were a ghost or something—" he went on, still sitting there. "Old Martha has been telling stories to me."

The girl sighed audibly.
 "I apologize most humbly," she said in a low, sweet voice that thrilled him. "You must not blame old Martha—I begged her to let me come in for a few minutes. There was no light and we thought you had gone to bed."

Gladwin arose and wheeled another chair to the fire. He tossed on some pine splinters and another log and turned to her with a charming gesture of hospitality.

"I am sure you will rest a little while," he said courteously.

"Oh, thank you," she hesitated and then swept forward and sank into the chair.

Gladwin saw that she was indeed flush and slow. He easily guessed that she must be the daughter of that fair Rosamond Dilly, who had eloped with her lover and displeased her stern parent.

"I am Rosamond Mallory," said the girl with a quick upward look at the portrait of her mother now visible in the candle light Gladwin had produced. "Today is my birthday—and I wanted to come back to the old home and look at her picture just once more. Grandmother does not know—she would be horrified at such an act. She doesn't understand how I feel about it. I never knew my mother, but I love her memory so dearly."

Gladwin's own eyes dimmed. He, too, had never known his mother and he understood the yearning for mother hands and mother heart to learn upon.

"I know," he said hoarsely, and glanced at him and knew that he understood. "It is very good of you to tell me all this, and now, you will honor me by remaining here as long as you please. I will send Martha to you at once."

She held out her hand, a flash of pink flesh and blood palm that covered in his own large grasp.

"I thank you sincerely, Mr. Gladwin," she said simply. "I am a grandmother will be glad to receive you; of course, you know it hurt to part with the old place, but I differently now that I have you."

"You are very good," murmured Gladwin as he bent over her. "Some day when Mrs. Dill is a receive visitors I will ride over Fairlawn."

When he left the room Rosamond was looking at the portrait of her mother with the same tenderness that the painted Rosamond upon her daughter.

He found a badly frightened Martha lingering outside the door but when he reassured her a her into the library with a refreshment for the unexpected visitor, she smiled gratefully and thereafter was devoted.

In time Gladwin's other came true. Into his lonely life came a beautiful love story painted lady in the picture tenderly down upon Gladwin's wife, Rosamond, and their and upon the white-haired mother, who came back in home to partake of their life!
