In selecting a subject for a dissertation, in compliance with the laws of this institution, I have been much perplexed, finding that every subject had been so ably treated, by authors, and candidates, that nothing of any import, could be offered by me on any subject. I have chosen for my dissertation, Miasmatic Intermitting Fever, not that I have any thing new in its pathology, or any improvement in its treatment to offer, but only to comply with the requisitions of this institution.

In writing on fever, having had no experience in practice, I shall attempt to collect, and arrange in my own manner, those which appear to me the most correct views on the subject, with which I am acquainted; at the same time acknowledging myself indebted, to books, and lectures for them, without naming, singly, the sources whence derived.
