State officials said there is no hook in Boyle County Fiscal Court’s financial statements about more than $15.5 million of net assets, according to a recent state audit by Auditor of Public Accounts Adam Edelen.

State officials said they evaluate every fiscal court in Kentucky annually. Boyle County was the one in Kentucky with about $5.1 million of tax revenue during 2010-11, according to the audit.

Each fiscal court must keep a list of all assets it owns. The only problem as pointed out in Boyle County’s report was with the list of assets, which they felt was incomplete.

Judge-Herald Harold McKinney wrote in response, “the county treasurer was the one who made the auditors aware of the prior omitted assets. She felt the county’s Fiscal Court should be accurate and reflect total assets. And county officials take pride in buildings and buildings in Millennium Park. The expenditures were lump-sum appropriations and funds, Boyle County contributions to Millennium Park ended in 2002.”

McKinney said during a telephone interview Friday, May 11, standing regarding whether Millennium Park assets should be counted as county property that the issue was “very minor and that the county had a ‘good audit’.”

“I think one reason we usually have no good audits is because they don’t keep adequate records. It’s hard for us to sign off on the things that are not in the records. So, I think it’s important to do such matters in an open forum and that also really helps with keeping accurate records.”
